G

G, g, indecl. n. or f. I. The seventh letter of the Latin alphabet, but which did not originally belong to the Latin orthography, its place being supplied by c. It was introduced about the time of the second Punic war. II. As an initial, g, in pure Latin words, enters into combination only with l and r; and therefore in words which, from their etymology, had the combination gn, the g was rejected in the classical age, and thus arose the classical forms natus, nosco, etc., from the original gnatus, gnosco, etc.; whereas in compounds the g again makes its appearance: cognatus, cognosco, etc. III. Commutation took place most freq. between g and c; v. the letter C:—with j in mejo from mingo, major from MAG (magis, maximus). *IV. J

J, j, n. indecl. or f. I. The tenth letter of the Roman alphabet, a consonant, originally represented by the same character as the vowel i. Its consonantal nature is most clearly proved by the fact that, with a preceding consonant, it always forms position. II. The pronunciation of j was like that of English y; only where j occurs as a medial between two vowels, it is, according to the statement of the grammarians, to be pronounced double; wherefore, in such cases it is also written doubly by many, as alio, Majia, ejus, pejius, etc. III. The closest relation exists between j and the vowel i, and hence, in the course of formation and inflection, it was very often changed into the latter: Pompejus, Pompei; Gajus, Gai; ajo, albam.—On the other hand, the j was often hardened by the poets into j, in order to form position: abjete, abjctibus, for abiete, abietibus.—J is related to ag, as mag-is, major (= mag-ior). IV. J is sometimes elided, especially in the poets, in the compounds of jacio before an i: abicet, adicet, obicet, etc., for abicet, adicet, obicet, etc., and in synæresis with a preceding vowel: eicet, reicet (dissyll.), for ejicet, rejicet.

K

K, k, indecl. n. or f., the eleventh letter of the Roman alphabet, used in the most ancient times of the language as a separate character for the sound k, while c was used for the sound g. When, in course of time, the character

c came to be used also for the k-sound, and, after the introduction of the character g, was used for it alone, the K disappeared almost entirely from the Latin orthography, except in certain abbreviations, as K. for Cæso, K. or Kal. for Calende.

Kæso, v. Cæso.

Kalendæ, v. Calendæ.

Karthago, v. Carthago.

L, l, indecl. n. or f.: the twelfth letter of the Latin alphabet. I. In power it corresponds with the Greek Λ. It is a liquid or semi-vowel, and possesses a threefold force according to its collocation. When it follows another l its sound is slight, as in ille, Metellus: when it ends a noun or syllable, as in a full sound, as in sol, sylva: in all other cases it has an intermediate power, as in lectus, lecta, lectum. II. L is interchanged: A. In simple words: 1. With d: v. letter D.—2. With n; as in lymphā from λύφῃ.—3. With r (so most comm.): liliū from λείριον; libellus for liberius; agellus for agerius.—4. With x, as maxilla for malla from mala; vexillum for velillum from velum.—B. In compound words: 1. With d; as alligo for adligo; allego for adlego.—2. With n; as colligo for conligo; colloco for conloco. III. L is dropped by syncope in vis for velis. IV. As an abbreviation, L denotes most frequently the prænomen Lucius; it, however, also represents latum, libens, liberus, longum, Lyciorum. ¶ The numerical mark L, for the number 50, is not properly the letter L, but a sign formed by placing a horizontal line at right angles to the lower part of the perpendicular line by which the number one is represented.

M

M, m, n. indecl. or f. the thirteenth letter of the Latin alphabet. I. In form and sound m corresponds to the Greek Μ. The Latin language, however, does not combine an initial m with n, as in the Greek μνά, μνήμα, μνίον, μνός, etc.; hence, the Greek μνά became Latin mina. The Latin language, contrary to the Greek, tolerated a final m; but its sound was obscure, and before an initial vowel, even in prose, was scarcely heard. In poetry, the vowel immediately preceding the m was also elided. II. M is interchanged: A. With n (most freq.):

*so, eundem, eandem, quandam, quorundam, tantundem, from eundem, etc.; and, on the other hand, in for in before labials and m: imbellis, imbibio, imbui; impar, impedio, imprimo; immanis, immergo, immulo, etc.; as also the regular employment of m for the final v of neuters borrowed from the Greek.—B. With v; as, Memers for Mavors; mare from Sanscrit vari, water.—C. With b; as hibernus, for hiernus. III. As an abbreviation, M. denotes most freq. the prænomen Marcus. M. denotes the prænomen Manius. IV. As a numeral, M, standing for CIO, denotes the number 1000.*

Before the guttural letters a medial n receives the sound of the y before gutturals, wherefore, in early times, we have also g written for n: Agchises, ageps, aggulus, aggens, agguilla, iggerunt, for Anchises, etc. II. Assimilation takes place before l, m, and r: illabor, immitto, irrumpe, for inlabor, immitto, inrumpe;—before the labials, n is changed into m: imberbis, imbutus, impar, impleo, for inberbis, inbutus, inpar, impleo. III. The frequent insertion and omission of n before s proceed from dialectical differences: Megalesia and Megalesia; frons and frus; quotiens, totiens, as well as quoties, toties, etc. Less frequently this takes place before other consonants, as lanterna and laterna; ligula and lingula.—The double forms alioquin and alioqui, ceteroquin and ceteroqui, seem to rest on purely phonetic grounds.
